 Il Parlamento affronta la questione della sicurezza dei deputati dopo l'aggressione subita da Helen Haines  Gli economisti prevedono un nuovo aumento dei tassi d'interesse a novembre. Il leader dell'opposizione Angus Taylor ha respinto le richieste avanzate da un deputato dei Nationals di abolire il Question Time. Tutti gli schieramenti politici sono stati invitati a valutare misure per ridurre la tensione nel dibattito pubblico australiano, dopo l'aggressione subita dalla deputata indipendente Helen Haines fuori dal suo ufficio elettorale nello stato del Victoria. Il deputato dei Nationals e assistente ministro ombra per i Servizi Sociali Pat Conaghan ha dichiarato di voler eliminare completamente il Question Time, sostenendo che sia uno strumento che contribuisce ad alimentare il clima di scontro politico. Il leader dell'opposizione Angus Taylor ha però dichiarato che una simile decisione finirebbe per indebolire i principi democratici su cui si fonda il sistema politico australiano. "Well I don't agree with him on this, we need that vigorous and rigorous debate, which has characterised our democracy since it was formed. Our democracy was built on the Westminster system, which requires vigorous and rigorous debate. But it should	 Parliament grapples with the threat to MPs in the wake of Helen Haines' attack  Economists point to another rate rise in November Opposition leader Angus Taylor has rejected calls from a Nationals MP to scrap Question Time. All sides of parliament are being urged to consider ways to reduce heat in Australia's political environment, after an attack on independent MP Helen Haines outside her electorate office in Victoria. Nationals MP and Opposition Assistant Minister for Social Services Pat Conaghan said he wants Question Time removed entirely, saying it's designed to raise the temperature. The Opposition leader says this would undermine the democratic principles of Australia's political system. "Well I don't agree with him on this, we need that vigorous and rigorous debate, which has characterised our democracy since it was formed. Our democracy was built on the Westminster system, which requires vigorous and rigorous debate. But it should never cross the line. And what we saw of course in Wangaratta a few days ago was a serious and terrible crossing of that line."

In seguito all'aggressione subita dalla deputata indipendente Helen Haines, diversi parlamentari hanno raccontato di essere stati a loro volta vittime di molestie e minacce.

Il primo ministro Anthony Albanese ha dichiarato che circa 20 persone sono state incriminate per minacce rivolte nei suoi confronti, e ha dichiarato di non leggere i commenti pubblicati sui propri account social per tutelare la sua salute mentale.

La ministra delle Finanze e deputata del Partito Laburista, Katy Gallagher, ha dichiarato al Nine Network di aver in passato segnalato minacce violente alla Polizia Federale Australiana.

"I think whilst men and women get it in politics, I think the nature of the threats and the violence towards women or threats of violence toward women are different. They are often sexualised, it is about rape, sexual assault, physical harm they want to do to you or your children. So I think, the nature of the threats towards women are different. I can't pretend women across the parliament aren't concerned about this - they are."

Gli economisti avvertono che gli australiani dovrebbero prepararsi a un nuovo aumento dei tassi d'interesse quando la Reserve Bank si riunirà il mese prossimo.

never cross the line. And what we saw of course in Wangaratta a few days ago was a serious and terrible crossing of that line."

In the wake of the attack on Dr Haines, a number of MPs have come forward about their own experiences with harassment and threats.

Prime Minister Anthony Albanese says around 20 charges have been laid against people over threats directed at him, and says he doesn't look at comments made on his own social media account, to protect his mental health.

Finance Minister and Labor MP Katy Gallagher told the Nine Network she has previously reported violent threats to the Australian Federal Police.

"I think whilst men and women get it in politics, I think the nature of the threats and the violence towards women or threats of violence toward women are different. They are often sexualised, it is about rape, sexual assault, physical harm they want to do to you or your children. So I think, the nature of the threats towards women are different. I can't pretend women across the parliament aren't concerned about this - they are."

Economists say Australians should be prepared for another rate rise when the Reserve Bank meets next month.

This week, the RBA indicated the inflation

indicato che le prospettive sull'inflazione non sono migliorate, alimentando i timori di un quinto aumento consecutivo dei tassi, che porterebbe il tasso ufficiale dal 4,6 al 4,85 per cento. Christian Bayliss è il fondatore di Fortlake Asset Management. Bayliss ha dichiarato che l'inflazione si mantiene a livelli vicini al doppio dell'obiettivo dal 2021 e che, rispetto all'anno scorso, una famiglia australiana media sostiene quest'anno circa 14.000 dollari in più di spese. "That is the tangible cost, that's the number we need to shine a light on when people feel angry, when people feel upset and they can't understand what it is that is wrong with the economy, that's the tangible number. That 14 thousand dollars, every household is spending that and they shouldn't have to be spending it and that's the issue ."	outlook has not improved, raising concerns of a fifth consecutive hike that would bring the cash rate from 4.6 to 4.85%. Christian Bayliss is the founder of Fortlake Asset Management. He says inflation has been running at nearly double that since 2021, with the average Australian household paying 14-thousand dollars more in expenses this year than last year. "That is the tangible cost, that's the number we need to shine a light on when people feel angry, when people feel upset and they can't understand what it is that is wrong with the economy, that's the tangible number. That 14 thousand dollars, every household is spending that and they shouldn't have to be spending it and that's the issue ."
